abstract:

The current socio-economic phase requires a review of the regional welfare systems. Research on regional welfare systems has shown how the Veneto system can be considered among the most structured and capable of social protection on the national scene. The beginning of this century has seen some parallel processes that have deeply affected the current structure of the social and health system, namely:

- the increase in the demand for social protection, characterized by a growing expansion in qualitative and quantitative terms
- the reduced contribution of the state which has gone through a first phase of reduction of the expansion phase of loans and a second in which the share has been reduced
- the rise of new needs linked to the profound transformation of the socio-economic dynamics of post-modernity
- the differentiation and increase of the actors of welfare policies with the growing presence of private profit and non-profit actors who do not have ties of dependence on the public body and who have also progressively shown the ability to use their own resources and a fair capacity for innovation in " provision of welfare services.

These transformation processes require a review of the role played by the various actors, in particular public ones, and a rethinking of the logic of governance and of the forms and methods of providing social and health services.

The transformation process activated by the Veneto region requires the development of research and analysis activities to be carried out also in the light of experiences and international debate.

In this perspective, the path to be activated will require:

- a qualitative and quantitative analysis of the evolution of demand (expressed and unexpressed for social protection, with particular reference to aging processes and the need to pay increasing attention to support for the family, the developmental age and the dynamism of the labor market)

- the qualitative and quantitative analysis of the complexity of the supply system and its strong diversification which has fragmented the system
- the development of participatory processes that involve the most innovative realities in the system review process. Also in this perspective it will be possible to use specific research techniques of a qualitative and quantitative nature
- the critical review of multilevel governance practices and the experimentation of processes that go beyond the merely hierarchical logic.

The skills needed to support these research processes concern:

- the ability to analyze the dynamics of welfare systems
- knowledge of the debate on the characteristics of regional and local welfare systems
- the ability to use qualitative and quantitative social research techniques.
