abstract:

The project focuses on the generalization and application of environmental macro-financial models to comprehensively account for all the risks stemming from climate change, including transition risks, chronic climate risks, and climate-related event risks. The goal is to provide a theoretical framework capable of accounting for different energy-generating sectors, carbon emissions, macro-financial, monetary, and climate policies, as well as various types of risks. Moreover, the work aims to identify and quantify the transmission channels of the potential transition on various types of economic agents and the entire economy, in order to enhance our understanding of this transition and assist in designing more effective policy responses.
