Data on contemporary populations show a smaller variance in the socio-economic gradient in life expectancy for women than for men. Investigating the presence of such a phenomenon in the past is necessary to understand its nature, temporal evolution, connection with the historical context and the role of the socio-economic status. The construction from archival sources of a long-term database on life expectancy at different ages by gender and by economic condition in the city of Venice in preindustrial times makes analyses aimed at answering these questions possible (Spoke 6).

A Working careers of women show a significant decline in participation and hours of work at the time of birth of children.
