We haven't just suffered during COVID. We've learned.

A CDC report published last summer detailed a dramatic increase in adolescents entering emergency departments for a range of reasons, including suicide attempts. (Data for suicides in the same period is incomplete.) These developments led the American Academy of Pediatrics, American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry, and Children's Hospital Association to declare a national emergency in youth mental health. In December, U.S. Surgeon General Vivek Murthy released an advisory on protecting youth mental health.

Matthew K. Nock, the Edgar Pierce Professor of Psychology and a research scientist at Massachusetts General Hospital and Boston Children's Hospital, studies suicide and other forms of self-harm. He spoke to the Gazette about recent findings in the field and what treatment might look like in a post-pandemic world. The interview was edited for clarity and length.

The impact of the Russian invasion of Ukraine, according to Stanford scholars, students

When Russia invaded Ukraine on Feb. 24, 2022, the Stanford community rallied to show its support for the Ukrainian people: Students hosted events, scholars offered insights into the crisis, professors hosted teach-ins, and in an unprecedented demonstration of solidarity, the Hoover Tower was illuminated in the yellow and blue colors of the Ukrainian flag.

For many, the unprovoked invasion was seen as an affront to the global world norms established after World War II.

“I’m also concerned, more broadly, about the implications of this invasion for our world,” said Stanford President Marc Tessier-Lavigne to the Faculty Senate on the day of the invasion. “The peace established in Europe after World War II – while not complete or unbroken before now – has nevertheless stood as a pillar of stability. The launch of a major land war in Europe is an extraordinary and shocking event of historic proportions.”
